Many experts believe that the chimpanzee is next to man in intelligence. The Yerkes, however, reasonably expect that the gorilla would be, in view of the more pronounced resemblance in structure of the nervous systems in the gorilla and man. It may be that the former judgement is colored by human performances. The gorilla is sullen, untamable and ferocious, shy, wary, and slow-moving. The chimpanzee, on the other hand, is more lively, tractable, gregarious, and "humanizable" - besides being of smaller size, and less dangerous to man than the gorilla. The fact is that psychologists know a great deal about the intelligence of the chimpanzee, whereas the gorilla's is relatively unknown. Meanwhile, it should be stated that gregariousness and amiability are not quite identical with intelligence. And if gorillas do not go out of their way to show affection for their human hunters and captors, this can scarcely be adduced as evidence against a respectable IQ.
